* SOME EARLY PRINCIPLES GUIDING THE ESTABLISHMENT

of
4-H CLUB WORK*

Compiled by E. W. Aiton, Field Agent

1. Equal Dignity and Status for Rural Youth. Forty years ago one might have observed distinct differences between average rural boys and girls and their city cousins. 4-H education, recreation, recognitions, tours, trips, club and community activities have helped equalize the opportunities and the development of rural young people.
2. Learning by Doing. With the home, farm and family as a laboratory, 4-H pioneered in the application of principles to practice. This idea serves as an incentive and "transfer medium" for the learning process.
3. Learning Thru Projects or Small Work Units. Every 4-H member carries a practical demonstration project which is within his ability, stimulating to his interest and of economic or social importance.
4. Ownership. Personal pride, satisfactions and incentives for growth and expansion result from individual ownership of property.
5. Dignity and Value of Work. By glorifying and glamourizing work habits and the results of constructive effort, the 4-H program has helped instill production values and sound attitudes into the minds of millions of young people.
6. Development of Family Partnerships. The paternalistic system has, to a large degree, been replaced by the family council table. Now it's "We and Ours" instead of Papa's and Mama's. A start toward farm or property ownership at an early age speeds the attainment and insures the tradition of the family-type farm.
7. Competition. An earnest struggle for survival and recognition in a realistic competitive society. Individual competitions have been stressed in 4-H Club work in the past. Perhaps the values of group competition have been under-estimated.
8. Coeducational Activity. Boys and girls have natural propinquities. Their soundest spiritual and mental growth depends upon development of proper attitudes toward each other. This is most easily done in a coeducation group process.
9. The Club Idea. In a democracy, group thought, activity and cooperation are of fundamental importance. Learning proper knowledge, skills and attitudes in this direction at an early age is basic to successful citizenship. There are over 11,000 4-H Clubs in every agricultural county.

10. Youth Teach Adults. Because they are less set in their ways youth can "show the way" to improvements by adults. Strong parental love and a desire for progress in their children frequently result in the 4-H member trying out a new improved practice first, the parent observes and follows it later, frequently unaware of how it happened.

*Some of these principles have been by-products of 4-H Club work. Others have been deliberately planned and specific activities have been developed to carry out the values inherent in them. In several cases, Extension workers pioneered in promoting definitely new educational processes. There are additional principles relating to over-all Cooperative Extension work which apply to 4-H but are not specific to it.
